Anika had been walking for what felt like an eternity. The dense forest was quiet, and every tree looked the same. The only sounds were the rustling of leaves and the occasional call of a distant bird. She was completely lost. Her small water bottle was empty, and the afternoon sun had started to disappear behind the tall trees, casting long shadows.

Just as she was about to give up and sit by a large oak tree, she saw something that made her heart pound. Hidden under a clump of ferns was a small, hand-carved wooden toy of a deer. It was not a toy a wild animal would have. It was smooth and carefully crafted, with tiny antlers.

Anika picked it up, her fingers tracing the intricate details. A surge of hope filled her. This toy meant someone else was in the forest. Someone had been here. She wasn't alone. Clutching the little wooden deer tightly, she looked around with newfound purpose. The fear of being lost was replaced by the excitement of a mystery. She decided to follow the trail of broken twigs and flattened grass that seemed to lead away from the oak tree, believing it might lead her to the person who had made the toy.
